

ADAM SORENSEN: BASIN

May 9th – June 22nd

Adam Sorensen

Historic Landscape painting is a lens I use to view our current relationship with a changing, yet invariably sublime natural world. Climate change is forcing us to imagine possibilities and confront probabilities about our shifting environment, yet our human brains continue to abstract these certainties. I use this ambiguity when making my paintings. 19th Century Romantics saw the sublime as a direct connection with a higher power, and emphasized that with embellished realism. My work substitutes the higher power with irreverence and uncertainty, yet retains the exaggeration of natural beauty.

The works in this exhibition all echo each other compositionally. The wall-like mountains of the mid ground form a vessel supplied by the waterfall of the foreground. The static viewpoint from the watery ledge, promotes a forward facing perspective, while also eliciting a feeling of uncertainty from the cresting cascade below. Is the basin below filling up? Are we being pulled into it, or are we safely looking over it and into the endless sky? Time, change, uncertainty, hope, dread, and peace all mingle in these metaphorical pools, much like our current relationship with the world around us.
